Millions of Americans watch us with their ears.

As expected, January 20, 1993 was filled with maximum media fanfare.

Only this inauguration was different. Because 6.5 million blind and visually-impaired people had the chance to experience it live, on TV.

For the first time in history, a nationally-broadcast news event was made accessible to the blind. Brought to life exclusively through Public Television's Descriptive Video Service.

A new TV format that provides added narration during pauses in dialogue. Illuminating scene changes, actions and gestures. ("Mr. Clinton is now placing his hand on the Bible.")

Currently available to 61% of all households, DVS will soon roll out across the country. The latest in a series of innovations pioneered by Public Television on behalf of the underserved.

Innovations we started back in 1972, by introducing closed-captioning for the deaf and hearing-impaired.

Innovations we continue today—by offering second languages on select shows, so foreign-speaking viewers can enjoy our programs.
