Contents for October 20, 1970 • Volume 34 Number 21

It's election year, and Jim Allison of the Republican National Committee has a tough assignment: the election of as many Republican senators as possible. Allison and company provide money (the Republicans have lots of it this year), speakers (Vice President Agnew is the most sought-after), research, advice and, of course, encouragement to local campaigners. For an inside view of an operator of the Republican think tank, read An All-Republican Senate? Jim Allison's Working on It, on page 34.
