Dear Reader:

If our female readers will promise not to rush out and read the rest of it, which doesn't apply at all, we will quote for you the last lines of Rudyard Kipling's "The Ladies," from which we borrow the title of Alan Stang's delightful article beginning on the next page. It goes like this: "What did the Colonel's Lady think?/ Nobody never knew./ Somebody asked the Sergeant's Wife./ An' she told 'em true!/ When you get to the man in the case./ They're like as a row of pins - / For the Colonel's Lady an' Judy O'Grady/ Are sisters under their skins!"

Which means, of course, that while you ladies have us men all figured out, we're still learning about women from you. And we hope Robert Welch will forgive us for saying we think that is about as certain a proof of The Romance of Education as we know. To tell the truth, it is the only thing we know about women of which we are at all certain.

Oh, there is one other thing. We know that women are the great preservers of the home and therefore of the homeland. We know that they are the keepers of the Decalogue and of the Copy Book Headings, preserving the home, the husband, the child, the garden, the organic whole of American heritage in the microcosm that is the family - preserving these things because a real woman is as ready to live for them as her man is ready to die for them.

So you will understand why we are proud to remind you that it was in this magazine that the distinguished essayist E. Merrill Root wrote in a letter to our daughters: "You will risk your life to bear the child; man must risk his life to defend you, the child, the country. You should even insist that man does his militant risking too; you will not really love him unless he does. You should say to him, like that mother of ancient Greece: 'Come home with your shield - or on it.'"

Sincerely,

Scott Stanley Jr.

Those Fascinating Conservative Women

Alan Stang is a former business editor for Prentice-Hall, Inc., and a television writer, producer, and consultant. Mr. Stang is an AMERICAN OPINION Contributing Editor and is author of the Western Islands bestsellers, It's Very Simple and The Actor. Author Stang, who earned his B.A. at City College of New York and his Masters at Columbia, is also a witty and dynamic speaker who lectures widely.

■ THERE is nothing in the world as beautiful as a woman. Nothing else even remotely comes close. And, of course, everybody knows this who knows the first thing about living. Anybody who doesn't is pathetically confused. Perhaps a good woman could straighten him out. Nothing in the world is as pretty or as warm. And women are the motive for much of what men do. It is for women that men create much of the world's art. It is for women that men create much of the world's industry. Indeed, it is usually for women that men struggle to advance. It was one woman's face that launched a thousand ships, causing a war that destroyed the ancient kingdom of Troy. It is women who preserve and extend the world's culture; who run its charities; who make life worth living; who give life its grace and elegance and charm - and much of its excitement. A world without women would be a dull and barren place, harsh and plain, a dead planet covered by a desert.

And without doubt the most beautiful and important of all womanly activities is the creation and preservation of comfortable homes for our families. It is women who arrange a place to come home to; who keep the home fires burning; who produce and nourish the next generation. Without women who do that, the next generation would not exist. Indeed, society would fall apart. All of this, once again, is amazingly obvious, and in normal times would be a waste of time to repeat; but these, of course, are not normal times. A totalitarian fraud known as the Women's Liberation Movement is now working to remove women from their homes and make them virtually the property of the federal government - and is doing so, typically, in the name of "equal rights."

Already the phony "movement" has done considerable damage, and has created considerable confusion between the sexes. For instance, when a man steps up to a bar for a beer these days, the chances are that before he plants his foot on the brass rail some woman will be there trying to buy him a drink. And if he lets her do that, she immediately assumes she has the right to take him home.

We men are tired of being used as sex symbols. We want to be wanted and valued for ourselves - for our own hopes, feelings, ambitions and characters. We're tired of being taken for granted and then cast aside. Indeed, recently some of us have taken corrective action. Your intrepid correspondent is a Founder and National Vice Commander of the Men's Liberation Front, Incorporated, and we demand Justice Now for the oppressed masculine minority.
