THE COVER

Symbolizing the 100th Anniversary, Nov. 17, of NRA's birth as an association of target-shooting riflemen, the memorabilia on the cover come from several sources. B. R. Sharp, Sr., of Jacksonville, Fla. furnished the 1873 match programs. The photograph of the 1897 Georgia State rifle team came from the collection of Col. Lindsey Henderson, Jr. (Ret'd) of Savannah, Ga. The centennial medallion in bronze and the brassard shown are available to NRA Members by purchase from NRA Headquarters. The rifle, a Remington Creedmoor from the NRA Firearms Museum, is a cal. .45-100-500 Sharps Straight, 2.6" case, with a 34" barrel, typical vernier sights, and an interesting buttstock adjustable for comb height. Cover photo by Rolfe M. Baggett on 4x5 Ektachrome with incandescent studio lighting.

A handcrafted scope costs more than it did in 1946.

About $4.95 more.

The original K4 cost $45. It was some scope. Big one-inch steel tube. Achromatic optics. Click adjustments. The works. It quickly became the world's best-selling hunting scope. It still is. Because we never stopped making it better. Covered adjustments were added in 1949. O-ring sealing in 1954. Nitrogen filling and a constantly-centered reticle in 1957. And on and on. A dozen big advances. Countless small improvements.

Most important, none of the improvements were made at the expense of craftsmanship. The K4 tube is still tough lightweight steel. It is still hand-polished. Then gun-blued. The old-fashioned way. We still make our own optics. Much of the work is performed by slow, skilled hands. Some of them have been making Weaver lenses for more than twenty years. We use a few machines, too. But only where the machines are more precise than the hands. Making scopes our way is expensive. Those skilled hands are hard to come by. And, take years to train. So, we've had to raise our prices. The 1971 K4 costs $49.95, or $4.95 more than the 1946 model. That's the price of progress.
