THE COVER

This remarkable Colt New Frontier Buntline revolver is 1977's effort for auction at the National Sporting Goods Association show. It's a .45, of course, with spare .45 ACP cylinder, and commemorates Ned Buntline himself. More pictures and details on page 22. Photo by staff photographer Zsuzsa Sandor.

The writings of Theodore Roosevelt reflect his reverence for the enduring virtues — for honesty and courage and all those values which make life worth living. A sportsman with a zest for the robust outdoor life, he loved shooting, an old and honored sport with an irresistible appeal — a major facet of man's nature, as his words so aptly tell. He loved fine rifles which exemplified the best of the gunmaker's art — the rifles that have always been a close part of the kind of life which his own typifies so completely.

We are proud of our sporting rifles because they fit this great philosophy. We have retained in today's line of fine Ruger rifles the careful craftsmanship and high quality that have always been characteristic of the finest sporting firearms. Creative Ruger engineering has combined the classic forms of the past with advanced manufacturing techniques to produce sporting rifles that provide the performance which Roosevelt himself would have demanded.
