Effort and Reward.

Reflections on cracker eating and the elfin work ethic.

There's one thing you can say for sure about elves. They're hard workers. Anyone who thinks cracker making is all fun and games has never been inside a hollow tree. Take Keebler® Club® crackers. Each one represents many elf hours.

What appears to be simply a golden, buttery-tasting cracker is actually a complex composite of at least six light, flaky layers you can snap into four slender sections of cracker-eating bliss. It may be elfin magic to you. But elves know better. They're happy to put in all the effort. Your pleasure is an elf's reward. So when someone remarks, "Gee, Club® is so big I have to break it," it hurts.

After all, the effort required to eat a Club® cracker is miniscule compared to the reward. The light, crispy texture.

The delicate, buttery taste. The reassurance that it's cholesterol-free. Even a low salt version for those who prefer it. True, you do have to break it. But when you consider all the elfin effort that goes into making every Keebler® Club® cracker, it's the least you can do.

Let the rewards begin.
